This method would have the disadvantage of leaving a triangular gap in the septum, which would require an artificial plate to prevent a subsequent saddle nose deformity. Another modification well worth consideration would be to fill in the quadrangular gap in the second stage of the operation by a horseshoe flap taken from the infraorbital region of one side and the forehead. (Cassidy, .Med. Record, vol. ?, page 534). These changes may all be made without disturbing the fundamental principle which have endeavored to emphasize, the transposition of the margins of the upper lateral cartilages to the location of the lower lateral cartilages so as to form a framework of sufficient rigidity to maintain the contour of the new ahe and so preserve the patulousness of the nostrils. To Kemovk a foreign body from under the...
